The Effects of Variation in Temporal Characteristics of Warning Lights on Their Attention-getting and Holding Value Under Day and Night Conditions William C. Hambacher,Howard F. Gallup,1956 Twelve subjects engaged in a tracking task were presented with stimuli consisting of a steady a flashing or an alternating light against a homogeneous background at an angle of 31 to 43 M 37.6 from the line of sight While tracking the subject was required to release his response key as quickly as possible to both the onset and the offset of the stimulus lights Four different delay periods were interspersed randomly between the READY signal and the onset or offset of the stimuli All subjects performed under both day and night conditions half beginning with day half beginning with night An analysis of variance performed on the data of this experiment indicated that there were no significant differences among reaction times to the onset of the three kinds of lights under either day or night conditions This relationship existed despite the fact that the steady light emitted a much greater total light flux than did the flashing and alternating lights The reaction time to the offset of the steady light was significantly faster than that to the offset of the flashing and alternating lights Reaction time to the onset of flashing and alternating lights was significantly faster than to offset of the same lights there was no significant difference between reaction times to onset and offset of a steady light The findings were in complete agreement with the predictions and with the results of a previous study
