Conclusion – The results of this study suggest that the use of the modified 30-second sit-to-stand test is a valid and reliable measure of lower extremity strength in older adults.

Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors associated with falls between two groups of nursing home residents. One group consisted of those who had fallen at least once during the previous year and the other group consisted of those who had not fallen during the same time period. Data were collected from 106 residents who had fallen and 97 residents who had not fallen. A chi-square test revealed no significant difference between the two groups in terms of gender, age, race, education, marital status, or length of stay. However, there were significant differences between the two groups in terms of functional status, cognitive status, and medication use.
