

Pathophysiology Process. To be able to explain further the relationship of pathophysiology process of Muscular dystrophy, understanding the dystrophin-deficient muscle is needed. In American Physiological Review's (APR, 2002) published medical journal, they were able to explain the pathophysiology of dystrophin-deficient muscle through their recent study of the relationship of pathophysiology process of muscular dystrophy to its anatomical structure.

APR's study of dystrophin-deficient muscle had revealed the following information:

Important abnormalities of dystrophin-deficient muscle cells have been demonstrated in three areas: calcium homeostasis, an increased susceptibility to oxidative toxins, and increased (and stress enhanceable) membrane permeability. Confirmation that the absence of dystrophin is indeed responsible for these abnormalities comes from experiments in which dystrophin has been restored.

They further explained that

It highlights the abnormal permeability of mechanically stressed muscle cells as the primary problem and links this through changes in protease and calcium channel activity to explain how a cell with badly deranged calcium homeostasis could result. This could in turn trigger necrosis or apoptosis. It is the case, however, that details of several of these steps are missing, for example, the molecular identity of the abnormal calcium channel and the biophysical nature of the membrane deficit.

The alterations that occur in dystrophin-deficient muscle are compound. It is also unraveling the underlying relationships between them, which is not basic. The complexity is compounded because the results explained is related to replica arrays at numerous diverse levels, which are intact animals, isolated whole muscles, single muscle fibers, and cultured myoblasts
