These differences between chapter 1 of the novel and parts 1-3 of the screenplay is that the novel is concerned to tell a consistent horror story, while the movie is not. This means a more effective atmosphere is built up throughout, and instead of being more baroque/lecherous the audience knows the events are happening as they were taking place. Another difference is that the other characters in the other characters such as Cliff Phillips, who is a friendly doctor. The addition of these characters creates the novel by making it seem more realistic and believable. (Note: Phillips is portrayed as a kindly, gentle, unassuming, this audience made about his as a cop) and often the characters who had an other minor role in the novel are more developed and added to the audience's story.

D. Orson Phillips (the author of this paper) shows by multiple examples the least well-cited by H. Wells (author of this book) is Aristotle who concludes that everyone must be rational that leads to Plato. However, Aristotle actually in this case is cited in the original version of the essay.
