

Module 10 Lab Worksheet: Human Development and Growth

Introduction

This module is designed to assess the developmental processes, characteristics of an embryo and fetus, changes to the system during pregnancy and the postnatal period.

Objectives

After reading this module's lab module, you should be able to: (1) Describe the process of fertilization (2) Compare and contrast embryonic and fetal development and its developmental changes across the range systems of a female during pregnancy and the postnatal period.

Introduction

Human development is a process that begins at fertilization and continues through the prenatal and postnatal periods. The process begins with the fusion of a sperm and an egg to form a zygote. The zygote then develops into an embryo and finally into a fetus. The process of development is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and nutrition. The process of development is also influenced by the mother's health and behavior during pregnancy. The process of development is a complex and ongoing process that continues throughout the life span.

After the sperm and the egg have fused, the resulting cell is called a zygote. The zygote then divides into two cells, which then divide again to form four cells. These four cells then divide again to form eight cells. This process of cell division continues for several days, and the resulting cells are called blastomeres. The blastomeres then develop into a morula, which is a ball of cells. The morula then develops into a gastrula, which is a three-layered structure. The gastrula then develops into a fetus. The fetus then develops into a baby.

During the prenatal period, the fetus develops in the uterus. The fetus is protected by the amniotic sac and the placenta. The placenta is the organ that connects the fetus to the mother. The placenta provides the fetus with oxygen and nutrients. The fetus also develops its own organs and systems. The fetus is born at approximately 38 weeks of gestation. After birth, the baby continues to develop and grow. The baby's body systems continue to mature, and the baby's brain continues to develop. The baby's growth and development are influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and nutrition.
