equipment is operated in a mode, such as steam out or pump out, that it is known the pressure relief system is not designed to protect against.

- Limitations on modification of equipment without the proper engineering review of the effect on the pressure relief system. Examples of these types of limitations are restrictions on changes of pump impeller sizes or turbine driver speed settings, operating control valves with their bypass valves partially or fully open, adjustment or removal of control valve minimum or limit stops or revisions to control valve internal trim.
- Operating procedures for shutting down a unit under pre-identified failure conditions.
- Vent and drain procedures for equipment maintenance.

1.2 DESIGN RESPONSIBILITIES

1.2.1 Establish Design Philosophy and Standards

The Unit Process Engineer determines causes of overpressure and flows to the relief and flare system for the process units. The Upset Condition Checklist and Individual Relief Summary Sheet are utilized for these tasks. Process data for relief devices are summarized and transmitted to the Control systems engineer on the Relief Valve Calculations Sheet.

The Unit Process Engineer for the relief and flare system reviews the relief loads for the various units and determines the disposal methods for the streams from each unit and maximum flow to each disposal system and calculates the sizes for all lines including relief device inlet piping. Other duties include developing process and system flow diagrams, providing process operating and design data for equipment and piping, and reviewing piping isometric drawings.

The Flare System Process Engineer provides assistance in development of the design philosophy and assures that the client standards and guides and applicable Laws and Codes are properly applied to the design. He will review plot plans for location of equipment containing volatile liquids and participate in the system design development and reviews as the project proceeds.

Design and maintenance of pressure relief systems is a multi-discipline activity which begins with the conceptual design of a new process unit, utility or offsite facility and continues throughout its use. Once a pressure relieving system has been designed and installed, legal obligations and responsible practice require that records of the engineering design basis, inspection and maintenance history for the system be kept.

The sizing basis for pressure relief systems is often directly related to process variables such as flow rates, equipment capacities or operating characteristics.
