Abstract Background Despite the well-known importance of sleep, sleep problems remain understudied in research on physical health. This theoretical review is written to help future longitudinal research with understanding sleep problems. Discussion The review will focus on the literature on sleep's relation to physical health, with particular attention to the pathways by which sleep problems may be related to physical health. Conclusions The findings in this review are consistent with the notion that sleep problems are related to physical health.

What assessment of the world's cities and countries in the 21st century makes the most sense? The answer is: it depends on the criteria. The world's cities and countries are changing in many ways, and the changes are different in different parts of the world. The world's cities and countries are becoming more diverse, more global, and more interconnected. The world's cities and countries are becoming more important, more powerful, and more influential. The world's cities and countries are becoming more complex, more challenging, and more exciting. The world's cities and countries are becoming more beautiful, more interesting, and more wonderful. The world's cities and countries are becoming more of what we need, more of what we want, and more of what we hope for. The world's cities and countries are becoming more of what we are, more of what we are becoming, and more of what we are becoming.
