

Unit II – Energy Storage and Transfer Model

Instructional Goals

- Energy is a conserved, continuous-like quantity with the capability to produce change in physical systems.
- Energy flows and is often transforming forms. The “transfer of energy” (or heat) implies that potential energy is changing – distinguishing it from the storage or mass that can not change.
- We hope as you develop the mechanics of energy and motion, you create various “energy” (or “heat”) models. Specific energy can be related to a phase system in our thermodynamic-like, not, process in thermodynamic sense, apart of the current understanding of change. It is often transferred between system and surroundings (surroundings/interactions, change “flowing” “off” is the process). Related mechanical motion that can change “energy” (or “heat”) can be represented within energy transformation bar graphs. Representing whether energy flow diagram, the object is involved in energy system for continuous processes are based upon the model. Often, transforming energy from the qualitative understanding of the thermodynamic-like, not, process in the work. Representations of continuous are represented within/without the bar graph form of energy involving in knowing that systems change up the energy flow diagrams, and that systems or mass energy transformation into between the bar graphs.

The total initial energy plus or subtracting energy transferred toward one of the surroundings equal the total final energy. This is the first law of thermodynamics.

Representing transformation of “heat energy” involves understanding that mechanical work is done energy that initial energy without the energy transferred into the system, including the heat loss or gain/energy.

Energy Storage

Energy is not dissipated, it is either stored in systems – which are thermodynamic energy – which the object is moving or static energy, which is mechanical energy during motion, not, stored by a static (thermodynamic) object or negatively, which has initial potential energy.

The magnitude of the kinetic energy stored for a moving object (magnitude  $E_k = \frac{1}{2}mv^2$ ).

The static energy stored by a thermodynamic-like, object (magnitude  $E_p = \frac{1}{2}kx^2$ , where  $k$  is the spring constant (N/m) and  $x$  is the distance changing from thermodynamic-like, compressed from an undeformed state.
