It is worth also noting that very few respondents following the 1995 elections perceived the new change. In a recent of opinion poll, respondents were asked the specific question: "In terms of the way the new parliament works, are you satisfied or dissatisfied?" Of the 1,000 respondents, 70% were dissatisfied with the way the new parliament works. This finding is similar to that of the 1995 elections, where 65% were dissatisfied. Following the 1995 elections, citizens perceived the performance of voting being of their choice, and that the new parliament was doing a good job. The change of a parliament to the first time, whether in the form of a new parliament, or the continuation of the larger house, the new building, regardless of the country, where voters turned to their ballots to elect the 1st, new parliament, claiming to be the greatest that was to date during the history of the country. Citizens, however, negatively perceived the new parliament, and it is probable that voters were dissatisfied with the country's status, the new parliament, the new laws, and the new system.
