Health Insurance on the Internet and the Economics of Search Mark V. Pauly, Bradley Herring, David Song, 2002 This paper explores the level and dispersion of premiums paid for individual health insurance by comparing asking price data posted on an electronic insurance exchange with survey data on premiums actually paid in the period just before the advent of electronic exchanges The primary theoretical question is whether the pattern of differences between asking prices and transactions prices can be explained using a simple search theory We hypothesize following suggestions of Stigler and Rothschild that higher risks who expect to pay higher premiums for a given policy will engage in more intensive search than lower risks given the same distribution of asking prices As a result for a given distribution of asking prices the dispersion of premiums actually paid transactions prices will be smaller for higher risks Therefore the introduction of an electronic exchange should have a larger potential influence on the dispersion and level of premiums paid for lower risks than for higher risks We find evidence consistent with each of these hypotheses

Paul R. Bergin, 2004 This paper advances the new open economy macroeconomic NOEM literature in an empirical direction estimating and testing a two country model Fit to U S and G 7 data the model performs moderately well for the exchange rate and current account Results offer guidance for future theoretical work Parameter estimates lend support to some common assumptions in the theoretical literature such as local currency pricing and risk sharing Estimates are found for key parameters commonly calibrated in the theoretical literature such as the elasticity of substitution between home and foreign composite goods and the response of a country risk premium to the net foreign asset position Results also indicate that deviations from interest rate parity are not closely related to monetary policy shocks as recently hypothesized Further results suggest that inserting explicit interest rate parity shocks into a NOEM model may be more helpful in explaining movements in the current account than the exchange rate NBER website The American Economic Review, 2005-03 Includes annual List of doctoral dissertations in political economy in progress in American universities and colleges and the Hand book of the American Economic Association Handbook of Health Economics Anthony J. Culver, Joseph P. Newhouse, 2000 Interpreting the Evidence on Life Cycle Skill Formation Flavio Cunha, James J. Heckman, 2005 This paper presents economic models of child development that capture the essence of recent findings from the empirical literature on skill formation The goal of this essay is to provide a theoretical framework for interpreting the evidence from a vast empirical literature for guiding the next generation of empirical studies and for formulating policy Central to our analysis is the concept that childhood has more than one stage We formalize the concepts of self productivity and complementarity of human capital investments and use them to explain the evidence on skill formation Together they explain why skill begets skill through a multiplier process Skill formation is a life cycle process It starts in the womb and goes on throughout life Families play a role in this process that is far more important than the role of schools There are multiple skills and multiple abilities that are important for adult success Abilities are both inherited and created and the traditional debate about nature versus nurture is scientifically obsolete Human capital investment exhibits both self productivity and complementarity Skill attainment at one stage of the life cycle raises skill attainment at later stages of the life cycle self productivity Early investment facilitates the productivity of later investment complementarity Early investments are not productive if they are not followed up by later investments another aspect of complementarity This complementarity explains why there is no equity efficiency trade off for early investment The returns to investing early in the life cycle are high Remediation of inadequate early investments is difficult and very costly as a consequence of both self productivity and complementarity Volatility, Employment and the Patterns of FDI in Emerging Markets Joshua Aizenman,2002 The purpose of this paper is to explore the implications of the deepening presence of multinationals in emerging markets on the cost of macroeconomic volatility there We find that macroeconomic volatility has a potentially large impact on employment and investment decisions of multinationals producing intermediate inputs in developing countries This is the case even for risk neutral multinationals as their profit function is non linear due to price and productivity effects For industries with costly capacity the multinationals would tend to invest in the more stable emerging markets Higher volatility of productivity shocks in an emerging market producing the intermediate inputs reduces the multinationals expected profits High enough instability in such a market would induce the multinationals to diversify intermediate inputs production investing in several emerging markets This effect is stronger in lower margin industries We identify circumstances where this diversification is costly to emerging markets Such a diversification increases the responsiveness of the multinationals employment in each country to productivity shocks channeling the average employment from the more to the less volatile location and reducing the multinationals total expected employment in emerging markets Closed Jaguar, Open Dragon Michael A. Clemens,Jeffrey G. Williamson,2002 Working Paper Series ,2002
