Abstract: The authors report on a 10-year longitudinal study of the development of reading and mathematics skills in a sample of 1,000 children. The study found that children who were reading at the 50th percentile at age 5 were at the 25th percentile by age 10, and children who were at the 25th percentile at age 5 were at the 10th percentile by age 10. The study also found that children who were at the 75th percentile at age 5 were at the 50th percentile by age 10, and children who were at the 50th percentile at age 5 were at the 25th percentile by age 10. The study suggests that early reading and mathematics skills are important predictors of later academic achievement.

It is more difficult to change the culture of a large organization than it is to change the culture of a small organization. The reason for this is that in a large organization, there are many more people who are involved in the decision-making process. This means that there are more people who have to be convinced of the need for change. In a small organization, on the other hand, there are fewer people involved in the decision-making process, so it is easier to get everyone on board with the change.
