Species that live on islands are often different from those that live on the mainland

many different finch species live on about 1000 miles off the northwest coast of South America. Darwin studied thirteen different species of finches. He noticed that each species had a different shape of beak. Darwin observed that the birds on the Galapagos islands had evolved differently from finches on the South American mainland. Darwin observed that finches had evolved from a common ancestor that came from the South American mainland but then branched out to fill all the different spaces of islands on the islands. Darwin's observations of the finches led him to the conclusion of the finches, which was the basis of his theory of natural selection. The finches evolved over generations of the Galapagos islands. Darwin also studied the different geographical characteristics of the islands.
