Building on this foundation, the researchers designed a series of experiments to explore the role of social norms in shaping consumer behavior. In the first experiment, participants were presented with a choice between two products: a standard, mass-produced item and a more sustainable, eco-friendly alternative. The researchers manipulated the social norm by providing information about the environmental impact of each product and the prevalence of sustainable choices within the community. The results showed that participants were more likely to choose the sustainable option when they perceived a strong social norm favoring sustainability.
