

ensuring legal disputes that often arise due to different levels of government are avoided. A strong central government prevents duplication of roles at the local government level (Norton, 2007).

National issues such as education, public welfare and environmental standards can be well addressed by the central government through categorical grants. Autonomous states tend to engage in unnecessary competition that can destabilize the whole country. A strong central government addresses the issue of regional inequalities by ensuring that national resources and employment opportunities are shared equally.

The local governments are not yet ready to handle public policy challenges due to the inequalities that exist in various states. The competition among different states is often a great hindrance to implementing a national policy.

This makes it difficult for local governments to handle issues that have national implications thus making it necessary to have a strong central government that will be in a position to address national issues. When policies are being formulated at the state level, it is only intellectuals who are involved and in the process ignoring the views of the public (Tocqueville, 2003).

In conclusion, Washington should have more power to dictate national policies for uniformity and equality. Local governments are useful in administration but should only play a subordinate role to the central government to prevent a conflict of interests. A strong central government helps in equal distribution of national resources and in the process addressing the inequalities that exist among different states.
