It is worth noting that the letter writers acknowledged their agreement to take on a very specific challenge and the implications of that choice: a real reduction in smoking. Agreeing to this and choosing to take part in the challenge was clearly a conscious and voluntary action and hence a legitimate way to participate without creating any kind of opportunity cost for the tobacco growers and businesses affected. It was therefore viewed as a matter of very conscious participation in tobacco harm reduction. Consensus procedures to reduce opportunity costs for participating and actively in public health interventions is different from what we have seen.
